Significance -- Brief summary including documentary evidence that indicates the historical, architectural or archeological significance of the site.

The Higgins House may be one of only several structures remaining that were associated with the 1926 real estate venture known as Aladdin City. The property on which the Higgins House stands was originally owned by Harry C. Higgins, one of the principal developers of Aladdin City. Historical research does not indicate whether the Higgins built the house or ever lived in it. However, based on the date of construction, location, and the unusual architectural style, it may be concluded that the house was constructed at the same time Aladdin City was being developed, perhaps as a model to attract buyers to the development.

During Miami's real estate boom in the mid 1920s many small developments sprang up in the area, some more successful and enduring than others. Miami Shores, Coral Gables, Miami Springs, and Opa-locka were among the more lasting. Others, such as Paoli Park, Mirador, Flagler City, Poinciana, and Alameda were short-lived. Aladdin City, in south Dade County near Hainlin Mill Drive and Southwest 162nd Avenue, falls somewhere between two categories: it wasn't very successful, but parts of it have endured through the years.

At the height of the real estate boom in south Florida, developers used a variety of approaches to publicize their suburbs and attract buyers. One such method was the creation of a "thematic" community that employed an architectural style or theme to unify the city appearance. The use of themes as a promotional tool to lure prospective buyers<sup>1</sup> became a common practice in south Florida during the boom period. Notable among these efforts were Glenn Curtiss' and James Bright's two developments: the Spanish Mission-style town of Hialeah and the Pueblo-revival community of County Club Estates, later known as Miami Springs. George Merrick used Mediterranean-style architecture to provide an easily recognizable image for his new city.

SEE CONTINUATION SHEET

The developers of Aladdin City capitalized on the theme and created an Arabian/Moorish motif for their city. Will and Florence Sovereign were the principal developers of Aladdin City. Will's brother, O.E. Sovereign, was also involved in the venture as were Cline Bagwell, W.J. Lampert, Frederick Keith, and Harry C. Higgins.<sup>2</sup> According to Mrs. Harry Higgins, "the Higgins family took everything they had and borrowed $10,000 to put into the project". The Sovereigns owned the Aladdin Company, located in Bay City, Michigan, which manufactured "redi-cut" prefab houses. They named the new city after their home building company.

In keeping with the Arabian theme, streets were given such names as Bagdad, Mustapha, Sinbad, and Ali-Baba Circle. Newspaper advertisements portrayed a genie with a vision of Aladdin City escaping from his magic lantern. Another boomtime development, Opa-locka in north Dade County, was also incorporating the Arabian theme and the advertisements for both cities were almost identical. Interestingly, both developments ran their first newspaper advertisement on the same day, January 3, 1926, back to back on the same page. Opa-locka's city plan may have been based on Ebenezer Howard's concept of garden cities which was receiving publicity in the United States at the time.<sup>4</sup> Opa-locka incorporated various aspects of the garden city idea such as distinct zoning for residential areas, shopping, industry, and recreation. Each homeowner was given a plot on which to grow food. Opa-locka was intended to be a self-contained community offering employment opportunities in manufacturing, construction, and service industries. No original city plan has been discovered that would allow for a direct connection between Aladdin City and the garden cities concept, however, there is a similarity between the street layout for Aladdin City and Opa-locka.

Newspaper articles described Aladdin as a seven million dollar project which would turn into "a new, beautiful and modern city surrounded by an old established agricultural community".<sup>5</sup> The city was to have such amenities as electric lights and power, local and long distance telephone service, sidewalks in front of every lot, public park and recreation grounds, and "the purest drinking water on every homesite". All streets were to be "sixty feet wide,<sup>6</sup> paved and oiled, with electric lighted boulevards one hundred feet wide". An attractive feature of the city was its close proximity to the Seaboard Air Line Railroad's new extension.

SIGNIFICANCE — CONTINUATION SHEET

A station house was erected in 1926 which employed one agent for a short time.

Pre-opening sale prices for lots in Aladdin City ranged from $750<sup>7</sup> for residential sites, $1,750 for business sites, and $3,000 for apartment sites.

Aladdin City held its grand opening on January 14, 1926 and the festivities included free transportation to the area, picnics, and the building of a house in one day. Classes at local schools were cancelled so everyone could watch this unimaginable feat. Building materials were delivered by airplanes. The completed house included plumbing, wiring, plaster, paint, and home furnishings. Unfortunately for Aladdin City, the Biltmore Hotel in Coral Gables held its grand opening the following day and the Miami Daily News devoted entire pages to this event, with little or no mention of Aladdin City. A subsequent advertisement for Aladdin stated that 874 homesites were sold on opening day. Due to the huge success of the first day's sales, the Aladdin Company announced it would soon be erecting a branch office and a mill in the area to keep up with the demand for new houses.<sup>8</sup>

The grand plans for Aladdin City to develop into a large community never materialized. The height of the land boom in South Florida had passed and was slowly declining. A devastating hurricane in September, 1926 struck the final blow to many boomtime development. Jean Taylor, south Dade historian, recalled perhaps ten to twelve houses were actually built in Aladdin City and many under construction were never finished, as people moved away to be near the shopping centers of Homestead and other south Dade towns. According to pioneer Otis Gossman, a building known as the city hall was constructed and he and his young friends played inside it during the 1930s. The building was later used as a polling place for Redland residents but has since been torn down. The railroad station was used as a potatoe packing house until it was destroyed by a hurricane in the 1960s.<sup>10</sup>

The Aladdin City Subdivision was re-platted in 1934. The dirt roads were never paved and only 3 or 4 street signs remain which bear their original Arabian names. The streets wind through the subdivision which is overgrown with grass and weeds. Several houses are still standing, including the Higgins House, which display some Moorish Revival architectural details including flat roofs, crenellated parapets, and horseshoe arches. It is assumed that the houses were related to Aladdin City, perhaps constructed as models to attract buyers to the development. It does not appear that they are of the "redi-cut" prefab type which the Aladdin Company manufactured. But the houses may be the only ones remaining which were associated with the boomtime development of Aladdin City.

Physical Description of Site (see attached photos):

The Higgins House, like the Sovereign House, is a good representative example of the typical inexpensive suburban development houses built throughout Dade County during the real estate boom of the 1920's. In this case, the Moorish theme has been reinforced by alterations to the front porch windows and opennings on the side of the carport. These opennings have been given the new profile of a horseshoe arched transom. The front opening of the carport has been enclosed by wood and glass double French doors, which now serve as the front door. All other windows have been upgraded by modern replacemtns. The house is a small, simple structure of masonry construction, faced in rough textured stucco. The house is typical of the Mission style buildings popular at the time. There is a rectangular mass for the main structure, topped by a continuous parapet with silhouette accents at the corners and at the center of each elevation. In front, a lower mass projects from the main facade, serving as carport and front porch. This entry mass repeats the parapet detail of the main facade at a lower height. Behind the parapets the roofs are flat, as typical of this building type.

It is in the carport that the building reflects a Moorish inspiration. The carport is pierced on three sides by large openings with low pointed arches with returns, of Moorish deviation.

The property is enclosed by a black chainlink fence. There is a large satellite dish on the front of the property.
